“Now we truly are a museum”

The small Frisian town of Hindeloopen has fewer than 900 residents, but it carries stories as if it were a metropolis. These stories come to life even more vividly after a major renovation of Museum Hindeloopen. “Thanks in no small part to our great collaboration with SDB,” says director Bernhard Hilgers. “They really thought along with us—about the budget, the design, and the planning.”

Showcase Story 11 - Colorful Hindeloopen

Hindeloopen, July 1653. The Frisian coastal town is flourishing like never before. Though small in size, it plays a significant role in maritime trade. That summer, around eighty captains sail two or three times via the Baltic Sea to Scandinavia. They depart with Dutch products like gin and wool and return with the finest spruces.

The ships head north for two reasons. First, the forests on the European mainland have been largely depleted, but the Netherlands still requires vast amounts of timber for ship and shipyard construction. Second, the inhabitants of Hindeloopen are Mennonites, opposing war and violence, thus choosing routes free from piracy.

Hindelooers sail with fluyt ships, characterized by their teardrop shape—narrow at the top and wide at the bottom—allowing for a spacious cargo hold. Notable are the loading hatches at the rear, enabling easy loading of timber into the hold, which has minimal internal partitions. Perfect for long logs.

“I'm always working on improvement”

At SDB Vitrinebouw, craftsmanship takes center stage. After all, it's the details – visible and invisible – that make the difference. And that's precisely what our team ensures. One of them is all-round technician Ron Erven (59). The Vught native worked here briefly in the late 1980s and returned in 2018.
